INTRODUCTION

Licensed and Certified Occupations in Vermont 2009 is a guide to occupations requiring licensing or certification by the State of Vermont. This publication is a resource for students and individuals exploring careers as well as people planning on moving to and working in Vermont.

It is a compilation of licenses or certifications issued by the State of Vermont that are required to practice or be declared qualified in an occupation. Business licenses and licenses issued by Federal agencies or local municipalities are not included.

There is a brief description of the work licensed/certified, required exams, fees, reciprocity with other states, number of licenses, occupations affected and contact information including a website, if available. For complete information and the latest changes to licensing statutes, readers are urged to contact the relevant board or agency.

Individuals planning on entering a training program or educational facility in order to practice in a licensed or certified occupation should contact the relevant board or agency to ensure the program meets State of Vermont standards.

We would like to thank all the boards and agencies for providing the information and assistance necessary in the preparation of this publication. Without their cooperation this publication would not be possible.

To view this publication or the information online, visit Vermont Labor Market Information, www.vtLmi.info

The Occupations section contains licensing and other occupational information such as wages, employment trends, skills, videos and much more.

To view licensing requirements for other states, look for Licensed Occupations under Career Tools at CareerOneStop, www.acinet.org.

TERMINOLOGY

The terminology used in regulating occupations can be confusing - some occupations are licensed and others are certified or registered, some licenses are available through reciprocity, others by endorsement. What is the difference? These terms and others are defined below.

Licensing, Certification or Registration

Licensing is the statutory process through which a person meets the legal requirements sufficient to be permitted by law to practice an occupation in the state. Applicants must meet certain requirements involving training, experience, minimum age, years of education and/or evidence of good moral character.

Certification, similar to licensing, "certifies" individuals to engage in a regulated occupation. Completion of an approved instructional program is a common requirement. Other requirements may include successful performance on a qualifying exam or completion of work experience.

Registration is a general term sometimes meaning regulating an activity, similar to licensing, or simply registering individuals engaged in an occupation. In the latter case, only listing one's name and address and payment of a fee is involved.

Reciprocity or Endorsement

Reciprocity denotes the relationship between two states when each state gives the subjects of the other certain privileges, on the condition that its own subjects shall enjoy similar privileges at the hands of the latter state. In other words, "you give people from our state licenses and we will give people from your state licenses". A licensure system based on reciprocity would require the authorities of each state to negotiate and enter agreements to recognize licenses issued by the other state without a further review of individual credentials.

Licensure by endorsement is used by state boards to grant licenses to professionals licensed in other states that have equivalent or more stringent standards. States may require additional qualifications or documentation before endorsing a license issued by another state. Professionals seeking licensure by endorsement may need to submit an application, original transcripts, letters of recommendation and fees to the state board for review and approval. Each state retains separate disciplinary authority over its licensees. Endorsement allows states to retain their traditional power to set and enforce standards that best meet the needs of the local population.

*O*Net Occupation*

O*Net is an occupational classification system that includes detailed analysis of worker attributes, such as knowledge and skills, and job characteristics, such as work duties and activities. More information is available online at www.onetcenter.org/usingOnet.html.
